FDA Approves Novel Diagnostic Dye for Endoscop,

July 15, 2022

Bludigo is the first indigotindisulfonate drug product approved by the FDA

The FDA has approved the French company Provepharm's new drug application for Bludigo (indigotindisulfonate). Bludigo is an indigo carmine injectable, a blue dye that is used as a diagnostic during bladder endoscopy for the assessment of the uterus in adults following surgical procedures. Damage of the ureters, the ducts carrying urine from kidney to bladder, can occur during urological and gynecological surgery. In fact, 82% of ureter injuries are caused during pelvic surgery and 75% of urinary tract injuries are due to gynecologic surgery, according to studies. If not identified during the surgical procedure, it may lead to severe post-surgical complications, including fistulas and sepsis. Bludigo was studied in multicenter trial in 118 patients who had an endoscopic urological or gynecological surgical procedure.

Brand name :Bludigo

Generic name: indigotindisulfonate sodium

Dosage form:injection.

Company: Provepharm

"Bludigo is the second Provepharm product marketing authorization from the FDA", said Girard, chief medical officer at Provepharm. ] not recommended for use in patients with an estimated with glomerular filtration rate less than 30 mL/min. The most common adverse reactions reported with Bludigo were constipation, nausea, vomiting, abdominal pain, pyrexia, ALT increase and dysuria. Bludigo is supplied in a single dose ampule containing 40 mg/5mL (8 mg/mL) of indigotindisulfonate sodium. According to Provepharm, the product is expected to be available in US soon.
